Q: Keep SQL query from including itself when retrieving a sub-set of data I have an SQL query which retrieves user info and also has a column called last visited. I want to retrieve a sub-set of data, which I am doing with: `SELECT *, MAX(lastVisited) as LastVisit FROM users WHERE active = '1' AND email = 'email@domain.com' AND login = 'username' LIMIT 10` which works perfectly when the query is displayed on the web page in a table. The problem is, I want to use a pagination system, and after 10 rows, the query's own generated page number is included in the query, so the result is two rows per page, one with the row number and last visited, and the other is the same row, but with its own page number and its own last visited. Is there a way to stop this from happening? A: Ok, so this is happening because you're using the same table to create a temp table as the one that's being queried. Since the page number is being set and the results being returned in an anonymous cursor, the cursor can't see the table that's being used by the temp table. If you put the query inside of a stored procedure that you use for pagination, the cursor can't see the temp table's data, so it won't have a problem with the temp table's pagination.
