Assessing and Optimizing the Effectiveness of Providing Feedback to Veterinary Students. Feedback is a learning method that can be used in education to improve student learning, and the use of feedback in veterinary medicine can be expected to continue increasing with advances in technology and the changing demands of the profession. The purpose of this article is to highlight the importance of student-generated feedback for improving learning, and to describe how this can be best implemented in veterinary medicine. The authors provide a review of literature on feedback as a learning technique and its effects on student performance, as well as a method for collecting and analyzing data on student perceptions of the effectiveness of feedback. The authors also provide their own experiences as a veterinary faculty on this topic and how they have adapted their teaching strategies to incorporate this feedback in a way that facilitates student learning and retention.

Chloroquine: one of the great challenges to treating malaria. Chloroquine (CQ) and the hydroxychloroquine derivatives remain the most effective drugs for treating Plasmodium falciparum malaria. Given that they have been used for almost 50 years, they continue to be a challenge to clinicians. The drug is still administered as a prophylactic treatment in malaria-endemic areas, despite the fact that the chloroquine resistance ratio (CQR/S) for P. falciparum strains from this area is 0.25 to 0.3. The utility of CQ as a treatment for P. vivax is well established, and its use as a treatment for P. ovale remains controversial. Resistance to chloroquine is now widespread in P. vivax and P. falciparum, with CQR ratios in excess of 10. This article reviews the molecular and clinical aspects of chloroquine resistance. CQ resistance is associated with mutations in a protein encoded by the D10 and a S12 locus of the P. falciparum chloroquine resistance transporter. Other mutations that have been implicated include changes
